

They Sell Them, Why Is It Not Ok To Use A Baby Pillow?

If you are pregnant and anxiously awaiting the birth of your new baby, you more than likely have also been waiting for months and months to lavish your precious infant with all kinds of cute and cuddly welcome home gifts. A wide variety of discount and department stores carry a huge selection of baby items. You have so much to choose from in adorable looking stuffed animals, and of course the perfect baby pillow you would like to purchase for their bed. It must be ok to buy pillows for babies, since so many of your favorite stores carry them, right? Unfortunately, this is not the case. Not only is doing such a thing not ok, it can be very dangerous, and can even be fatal to put a stuffed animal or baby pillow in the same bed with your newborn or infant baby. The use of baby pillows or stuffed animals can end up being deadly, even if your adorable baby sleeps in a bassinet or baby bed or his own.

A variety of things are used in the making of these pillows, and any one of them could be harmful for your baby. It is no secret that all newborn babies have very sensitive skin. Your newborns skin could become irritated very easily from the various dyes and fabrics that are used to make a baby pillow.

When many parents think of the comfort of their bundle of joy, they are only trying to be helpful when they buy a baby pillow. However, if you are expecting, the very first thing you can do for the benefit of your new baby, is become educated on many of the safety issues that can literally mean the life and death of your baby. The bottom line is, there are too many risks that are involved when you put a pillow close to a baby that is under the age of two. Even at two years of age, some toddlers are not ready for a baby pillow. Many researchers advise against the use of pillows for your little ones until they have reached their toddler years of two years old, and they are no longer sleeping in a baby bed.
