

Will Social Security Work For The People That Need It The Most

What are my options if the SSA determines that I am not disabled anymore and is cutting off my Social Security benefits? All disability cases are subjected to regular reviews by the Social Security Administration. These review periods vary depending on the particular condition. If the member is expected to recover, a review will be done in 6 to 30 months time. If a possibility that the condition will improve remains, the review will be undertaken after 3 years. If the condition is deemed permanent, a review will be done in 5 to 7 years.

The review will be conducted by the Disability Determination Services department of the Social Security Administration in order to find out if the member should go on receiving Social Security benefits. A number of questions will be asked regarding the original condition, any changes that have occurred, any treatment that has recently been undertaken, and the work status of the member since the Social Security benefits were given. A medical examiner will then determine the present state of the members medical condition. If it is determined that the member is able to return to work, the Social Security benefits will stop.

If you feel that you are still disabled at this point, you may appeal the decision with the Social Security Administration office. You may then be asked to attend a hearing, upon which time a reconsideration decision will be made. If the decision to discontinue your Social Security Benefits still stands, you may make an appeal in a federal district court or present your case before a judge of administrative law.

Will SSA pay me to care for my disabled spouse? While there is currently no provision in the SSA that will directly pay you to care for your disabled spouse, you may be eligible to receive certain benefits once your spouse receives Social Security benefits. These benefits will be given every month and can be up to 50 percent of the disability benefits of your spouse. Keep in mind that there is a limit to the total amount of social security benefits that can be given to a family based on your spouses Social Security account.

The VA found me disabled. Wont SSA come to the same conclusion? One of the main differences between the SSA system and the VA system is that the SSA does not place percentage levels on disability. Therefore, while you may be eligible for benefits under the VA system even if you are only partially disabled, there is still a chance that you may be turned down by the SSA.

About the Author

Find more about social security disability lawyer, try HillandPonton.com.

Source: <http://greatreads4.com>